Utah History

Members of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints (more commonly called “Mormons”) arrived in the Salt Lake Valley in 1847. Fleeing religious persecution suffered in Missouri and Illinois, large groups of Mormons, under the direction of their prophet, Brigham Young, trekked west into Utah by covered wagon and handcart until the railroad was completed in 1869. Prior to their arrival the only permanent inhabitants were Gosiute, Southern Paiute, Ute, Shoshone, and Navajo tribes.

Known for a time by these new settlers as the State of Deseret, colonies were established as far north as the Salmon River in Idaho, south to New Mexico and Arizona and west into Nevada and California. These boundaries were submitted to the U.S. government for entry into the Union but the Compromise of 1850 created the Territory of Utah with much smaller land coverage. For the first six years, the territorial government seat was Fillmore before Salt Lake City was designated as the capital.

Utah history and growth is intimately tied to rise of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints. As the Mormons sent missionaries out into the world to proselytize, tens of thousands of immigrants from the British Isles, Scandinavia and the South Pacific streamed into the territory. Mining operations were soon setup in various areas of the territory that quickly brought non-Mormon immigrants from Italy and Greece. The railroad brought additional immigrants of Asian and African descent. The transcontinental railroad, connecting the Central Pacific and Union Pacific, was completed with a ceremony at Promontory Summit on 10 May 1869. This opened the country for even more westward expansion.

Tension between Utah territorial leadership and the U.S. federal government was troublesome from the time the Mormon settlers first arrived. Federal governors and judges were sent to the territory. Federal troops were deployed and military camps were setup. Federal laws clashed with Mormon religious practices. Those religious practices were revised in 1890 and in 1896 the federal government granted statehood to Utah.

The turn of the century brought additional Mormon immigrants and mining interests, including the beginning of copper mining in the well-known Bingham Canyon Copper Mine. The 1930s saw more than 116 CCC camps setup within the state. Over time several national parks were created in the state of Utah. These parks, together with Temple Square (the largest tourist attraction in the state and home to the world famous Family History Library), serve to bring millions of tourists to Utah each year.
Utah Census Records

Federal censuses for Utah began in 1850. Mortality schedules for Utah exist for 1850-1880. The 1890 Veterans schedule also survives.

The LDS Church conducted a membership census known as a Bishops’ Report in 1852. An official state census was taken in 1856. This census, however, has been found to be padded, including some people multiple times and including records for people known to be deceased at the time. An additional census was taken in 1872 but only covered Kane, Rich, Tooele and Utah counties.

An additional six censuses of LDS Church membership were published for the years 1914-1960. These cover worldwide church membership, the largest percentage of which were within the state of Utah.

Utah Vital Records

From 1847 until 1898 birth and death records were kept at a city level. In 1898 the state law changed to require counties to keep these records. Statewide registration of births and deaths began in 1905. Utah privacy laws keep birth records private for 100 years. Death records are private for 50 years.

Civil registration of marriages was not required in Utah until 1887, though there are civil records of a few that exist prior to that year. Some marriages from 1850 were published in the statewide newspaper, The Deseret News. Marriage records are private for 75 years.

- Utah State Archives: All surviving registers are available on microfilm through the Utah State Archives. Some have been digitized and are searchable on their website.
